The Bliss family is ultra-Bohemian. Judith, the mother, is a retired actress to whom all the world is literally a stage, and everyone she meets a character in a play. David, her husband, is a novelist, and there are also Sorel, a beautiful and ill-mannered girl, and Simon, a handsome and equally ill-mannered son. They each casually announce one Saturday afternoon they are expecting a guest for the week-end. Judith has invited an athletic young man who is in love with her celebrated actress glamour, Sorel, a diplomatist, Simon, a woman of the world, and David, a flapper—a type he is studying for a novel. They all want their guest to have the Japanese room, and when they do arrive, to say they receive a rude reception is hardly adequate. Developments soon take place and Judith pairs up with the diplomatist, David with his son's young woman, Sorel with the athlete, and Simon with the flapper. The outcome of the situation takes various turns. The family is thoroughly used to such displays, but the guests are most bewildered, so bewildered indeed that they all slink off home early next morning.
